Home has been very important to people ever since they started to live in caves and paint pictures on the walls. They have always needed two main things from home. First and most important, they have needed protection from danger. Secondly they have wanted comfort as far as possible. For most people, home is a fixed place; a house or a flat in a town or a village. But for some groups of people around the world, home is not fixed.

Nomadic people move from place to place, often following the animals which they herd or hunt. The nomadic hunters of Mongolia live in large tents called ger. The ger are made of a round wooden frame which is covered by a heavy tent. It has one room where the whole family sleeps, cooks and eats. Groups of families move at least twice a year from a summer to a winter camp. The ger are packed up and rebuilt in a new place.

The Sámi people live in the northern part of Norway, Finland and Sweden. Traditionally, many Sámi are reindeer herders and in the past, whole families moved with the reindeer herds, living in tents. Nowadays most Sámi families live in towns or villages, but the herders still move with their animals. Like many nomadic groups, their lifestyle is threatened by changes in the modern world. If the Sámi can't move their herds to their feeding areas, their lifestyle will disappear. In Norway, the right to herd reindeer is legally protected and can only be done by Sámi people.

The Bedouin people live in the deserts of Arabia and north-east Africa. They are nomadic herders who travel through the desert by camel with their sheep and goats. Because the land is so hot and dry, they have to move often to find enough food and water for their animals. They live in simple tents which are divided into two sections by a curtain. One part is for men and for guests. The other part is where the women live and cook.

Zaha Hadid

Who is Zaha Hadid? By Peter Hedley

What does a famous architect look like? Well, he's normally quite old with white hair. He often looks rather serious. Sometimes he wears modern glasses (the latest fashion), and grey suits. He comes from England, the USA, Germany, Japan or Spain.

But not Zaha Hadid. Firstly, she's a woman. And then she grew up in Iraq before she went to London as a student. Zaha, who is not a quiet person, is passionate about what she does. In the words of writer Christopher Hawthorne, she is a big woman with a bigger intellect and a gigantic personality. She wears fashionable clothes, bright shiny jewellery, and very high-heeled shoes. When she's excited she rolls her eye, and shouts at the students and colleagues who work with her. But the same colleagues and friends say that she is good with people; it's just that she cares, really cares about architecture. As one of her friends says, when you get to know Zaha Hadid, you realize that all the storms are on the outside-the weather may be bad the other side of the window, but in the house it's all calm and peaceful!

But it hasn't always been easy for Zaha Hadid. In 1994, she won a competition for a new opera house in Cardiff, Wales (UK). The public weren't interested, however. They said they wanted a new sports stadium, not the opera house and so her design was never built. But other people were noticing her work and suddenly she was designing building all over the world (like the Museum of Contemporary Art in Cincinnati, USA) and winning prizes.

In the newspapers they call Zaha the 'diva of contemporary architecture'-as if she was a bad tempered opera star. Zaha Hadid's reply? 'Would they call me a dive if I was a guy'

When you get to know Zaha Hadid, you realize that the weather may be ____ the other side of the window ____ in the house it's all ____.
